OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Moves to Annenberg Public Policy Center (APPC)

PHILADELPHIA (June 24, 2021) – The Center for Ethics and the Rule of Law (CERL) at the University of Pennsylvania will become formally affiliated with the university's Annenberg Public Policy Center (APPC), moving from Penn Law, effective July 1, 2021, both centers announced today. The decision was fueled by the centers' desire to join forces and have a greater impact in promoting and strengthening the rule of law in democratic governance.

"This is a significant development in academia's efforts to protect and preserve the rule of law, and CERL is honored to be officially affiliated with APPC," said Claire O. Finkelstein, CERL's founder and academic director and the Algernon Biddle Professor of Law and Professor of Philosophy at Penn Law. "We are thrilled to collaborate with Kathleen Hall Jamieson and the APPC team on vital projects that will help maintain and strengthen our democracy's ideals and institutions."

Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director and founder of APPC and the Elizabeth Ware Packard Professor of Communication at Penn's Annenberg School for Communication, is equally delighted that the two centers are combining their complementary expertise and talents. "CERL and APPC have been allies in bringing attention to the erosion of the country's democratic norms and laws," she said. "CERL's national security expertise and APPC's work in policy making and communication scholarship are a natural fit for advancing the rule of law among policy makers, academia, and the public."

Professor Finkelstein will remain a full-time member of the Penn Law faculty.

In March 2020, the two centers announced an alliance and collaborated on an October 2020 conference on climate security communications and an April 2021 conference on escalation of nuclear threat communications. Post-July 1 projects will focus on the closing of the Guantánamo Bay detention center, U.S. violent extremism, and civic education in the military.
